

When You're Not Overreacting. They Just Ghosted You

Being ghosted can feel confusing and personal.

Before you assume you did something wrong, pause.

When someone suddenly disappears, your mind naturally looks for meaning:

- What did I do?
- Did I say too much?
- Was I too intense?
- Should I reach out again?

This reaction is normal. Your brain is trying to resolve uncertainty.

But ghosting is information about their communication style, not proof that you are "too much" or "not enough."

1. Separate Rejection from the Story

Rejection means someone chose not to continue the interaction.

The story we attach to it often sounds like:

- I'm too much.
- I'm not interesting enough.
- I always mess things up.

Ask yourself:

- What facts do I actually have?
- What assumptions am I adding?

Silence may hurt, but it is still information.

2. Be Careful About Chasing Closure

It's tempting to send another message for clarification.

Before you do, ask:

- Am I seeking clarity or relief from anxiety?
- Will this action increase or decrease my self-respect?

Sometimes the most self-protective response is no response.

3. Regulate Before Reacting

Ghosting can activate a stress response: racing thoughts, urges to check your phone, or immediate messaging.

Try:

- Waiting 24–48 hours before responding.
- Talking it through with a trusted friend.
- Writing what you want to say — but not sending it.

Regulation first. Decisions second.

4. Reflect Without Self-Blame

Healthy reflection helps you grow. Self-criticism does not.

Consider:

- Did I ignore early signs of inconsistency?
- Did I move faster than the connection supported?
- What boundaries do I want to hold next time?

This is about learning, not judging yourself.

5. If They Reappear

You are allowed to acknowledge the gap.

A calm response might sound like:

“I hadn’t heard from you, so I assumed you weren’t interested.”

Clear. Neutral. Respectful.

Notice how they respond. Consistency matters.

Bottom Line

Ghosting can sting.

But someone else’s silence does not define your worth.

Your job is not to chase reassurance.

Your job is to maintain self-respect.
